Client Readiness Briefing

How Organisations Prepare Complex Issues for Responsible
PII-Led Review

Prepare the issue before requesting the review.

Executive Orientation

Good analysis begins before the framework is applied.

It begins with responsible preparation of the issue.

An organisation may know that something is urgent, contested, unclear, risky, reputationally sensitive, or strategically important. But that does not mean the issue is ready for structured review.

A live issue may be real but poorly prepared. A decision may be urgent but insufficiently framed. A board paper may exist but contain only one interpretation. A stakeholder problem may be active but not yet understood.

A communication response may be drafted before the organisation has clarified what problem it is actually addressing.

The purpose of client readiness is to prepare the issue responsibly before PII applies selected frameworks internally.

This does not mean the client must already know the answer. It means the client should provide enough context, material, history, stakeholder information, constraints, decision pressure, prior interpretations, and desired output for PII-led review to begin from a responsible information base.

The central question is: Has the issue been prepared responsibly enough for PII-led review?

This briefing introduces client readiness as a professional preparation layer for organisations that may wish to request one of PII's applied services, including:

- Problem Classification Review
- Admissibility Review
- Interpretive Governance Review
- Stakeholder Interpretation Review
- future PII-led analytical services

This briefing introduces selected PII concepts at a professional orientation level. It does not disclose PII's full proprietary readiness, triage, or framework-selection architecture.

Core Question

Before requesting a review, ask:
What exactly is being submitted for interpretation, classification, or assessment?
